

ABOUT US

The parties to a criminal case are the government and the accused criminal defendant. The attorneys for the government must advocate for the interests of society as a whole, which are sometimes different from the interests of the victim - the person directly affected by the crime. It is for this reason that victim advocates nationwide have fought for enforceable legal rights for crime victims, including the right to be represented by their own attorney as a way of ensuring an independent voice throughout the legal process.
